All along the turbulent river brawling through the great forests where men in the raw toiled strenuously, they called the grim silent woods boss "The Tornado". He was a stern taskmaster but fair withal, even those who hated him admitted. And even the labor agitators whom he ran out of the district admitted that he had no fear. One day there came to the settlement a man and a woman strange to the district, for they were of the city and of high civilization. The first time "The Tornado" saw them it was apparent that he had known them before and that he had a secret past. What the denizens of the settlement did not know was that once the woman and "The Tornado" had been sweethearts but that the other man, taking advantage of an opportunity created by the Great War had beguiled the woman into marrying him. But this the residents of the logging camp did not learn until after "The Tornado" had saved the settlement from the long jam threat caused by a great storm by risking his life in swirling waters and tossing trees until he broke the jam. Then, swept away himself he came upon the wreck of the train in which the man and the woman fled from his wrath and after extraordinary effort saved the woman--but the rapacious river snatched the man away, forever, and "The Tornado's" soul was washed clean of the knowing hatred that had made him what they called him.
